JAAKKO HÄMEEN-ANTTILA

An Old-Fashioned Genre – Maqāma in the 18th Century

Abstract

The eighteenth century was crucial for the development of Arabic literature. While some genres were more prone to change, the maqāma remained a conservative and elitist genre. Yet it did enjoy a kind of renaissance in the eighteenth century. The maqāmas of the eighteenth century were a varied lot, both qualitatively and content wise. Al-Ḥarīrī remained the favourite model for eighteenth-century authors. Also other great authors of the past, such as Az-Zamaḥšarī and As-Suyūṭī, were often imitated. The article surveys the production of maqāmas in the eighteenth century.

Keywords: maqāmas, 18th century, history of literature

The eighteenth century was crucial for the development of Arabic literature. While old styles and ancient genres remained alive and dominated the cultural atmosphere, new trends started slowly developing. Little by little the tradition was modified, and new themes and stylistic modifications appeared. By the end of the century, European, mainly French, influences found their way into Arabic literature with an unprecedented strength of impact. For almost a millennium, Arabic literature had remained immune to foreign influences of this magnitude and one has to go back to the early ‘Abbāsid period to find an influx of similar importance, that time from Persia.¹

While some genres were more prone to change, the maqāma remained a conservative and elitist genre.\(^2\) Yet it did enjoy a kind of renaissance in the eighteenth century. At least, we know of more maqāma authors from this century than from the previous ones and the success continued during the following century. According to my listing of maqāma authors,\(^3\) there are 29 authors who died between 1700 and 1799, whereas the previous century can only boast of twelve authors. From the nineteenth century we know about the same number of authors, 31. While the list could be expanded, the numbers are comparable and we may clearly see that the oncoming modernity was actually signalled by an increase in the number of authors working within this very conservative genre.

To be able to follow the development of the genre, we have to start by discussing the definition of the term maqāma and the boundaries of the genre. Basically, we have two ways of defining what a maqāma is at any given period of time. We may start with the definitions given by the authors and/or their biographers or anthologists and call those and only those texts maqāmas which are so labelled in the sources. This, however, is not a very satisfactory way to proceed, as there seems to be much confusion in the use of the term. Native literary theory never defined the genre, so that we do not have a well-defined answer from pre-Modern times to the question: “What, exactly, is a maqāma?” In the beginning, maqāmas were understood in vague terms of imitating Al-Hamaḏānī and, since the early twelfth century, Al-Ḥarīrī, but the later we get the more amorphous the term’s use becomes and the difference between a Hamaḏānīan or Ḥarīrian maqāma and any piece of rhymed prose becomes blurred. Not even the use of a fictitious isnād is always kept in later maqāmas, nor is it restricted to them, and very often it remains the only common feature, besides the use of ṣağ, between a late text labelled “maqāma” and the work of Al-Hamaḏānī and Al-Ḥarīrī. Incidentally, even the formal element of the isnād is problematic. In later maqāmas, the fictitious narrator often bore the name of the author himself and, especially in anthologies and biographical dictionaries, the isnād was sometimes dropped. Hence, e.g., Ar-Rasmī’s ([171] d. 1197/1783) Al-Maqāma az-Zulāliyya al-Baṣṣāriyya, as it stands in Al-Murādī’s Silk ad-durar (I: 74–77), starts abruptly, without the speaker having been identified in an isnād.

The self-definitions being often misleading and a native theoretical definition lacking, we are left with another possibility. We have to define the genre on the basis of internal criteria and take the titles of the texts as of only secondary importance. Thus, many texts labelled maqāmas need not be taken by us to belong to the genre and, vice versa, we may add texts which are not called maqāmas but which do fulfil the requirements of the genre as we define it. Without going into more details here, let it suffice to say that I understand three features as the cornerstones of a maqāma, viz. a fictitious isnād (or, at least, an implicitly fictitious scene of narration), a fictitious hero (often, but not always, accompanied by a fictitious narrator who may use the name of the author) and,

---
3 Hämeen-Anttila, Maqama, pp. 396–407. Numbers in square brackets after an author’s name refer to this list.
finally, the use of sağ'. It should be emphasized that we cannot limit the genre to the picaresque maqāma, which is the most famous but not the only, nor even the most popular, subgenre. Distinguishing the genre from the munāẓara is especially problematic from at least the fifteenth century onwards, when personified non-human characters started appearing more and more often as maqāma heroes, as in the flower maqāmas of As-Suyūṭī ([119], d. 911/1505). They being among the most famous maqāmas, it would be somewhat awkward to rule them out from the genre, yet, in fact, it would be easier to classify the texts as munāẓaras rather than maqāmas.

The maqāmas of the eighteenth century were a varied lot, both qualitatively and content wise. To give an idea of the variety of maqāmas in the eighteenth century, we may select some authors who died between 1700 and 1799 and who wrote widely different maqāmas. Hence, e.g., Aš-Šibāmī ([149], d. 1115/1703) wrote maqāmas after the fashion of Az-Zamaḫšarī in the tradition of exhortatory maqāmas. Al-Fāṣī ([154], wrote in 1120/1708) composed eulogies on the prophet after the model of Al-Ḥarīrī, and Al-Marīnī ([159], d. 1145/1732) wrote panegyric maqāmas on his patron – in later centuries, the genre was more and more drawn into the tradition of panegyric court literature with its mercenary aims. The process was, of course, already set in motion by Al-Hamaḏānī himself, among whose maqāmas there are several written for Ḥalaf Ibn Aḥmad, but the full impact of this development was seen only centuries later, when more and more often the heroes in the end are advised to go and see the patron, or patron-to-be, of the author. Whether there was at any time a conscious imitation of the panegyric qaṣīda, remains a point to be studied, but the structural similarities of the two genres are unmistakable.

To come back to the variety of the 18th-century maqāma, ‘Abd al-Baqī ‘Arīf ([155], d. 1125/1713) celebrated conquests in his maqāmas, while Al-Wargin ([169] d. 1190/1776) personified a tavern pulled down by ‘Alī Bāšā, clearing the ground for a madrasa. Al-Ḥifnī ([164] d. 1178/1764) wrote munāẓaras between wine and flowers using the maqāma structure, after the fashion of As-Suyūṭī who had made this subgenre one of the most popular ones since the 15th century. No city maqāmas seem to have been written by authors of the 18th century, but this seems accidental, and an early 19th-century author, Ar-Rāfīṭī ([181] d. 1230/1815), wrote a maqāma entitled Maqāmat al-mufīḥara bayna Ḥims wa-Hamā. The boundaries of the genre remained wide apart and maqāmas covered topics from obscene pieces to learned discussions and pious sermons. Whatever one may say of eighteenth-century authors, one cannot blame them for not putting all possible varieties into use.

Al-Ḥarīrī remained the favourite model for eighteenth-century authors. Also other great authors of the past, such as Az-Zamaḫšarī and As-Suyūṭī, were often imitated – one might add that, contrary to the interests of modern scholars, Al-Hamaḏānī was not popular and his maqāmas were often considered somewhat simple. He had been eclipsed, once and for all, by Al-Ḥarīrī and he never regained his popularity before modern times, as one may easily see when comparing the number and provenience of the manuscripts of each. Al-Hamāḍānī’s maqāmas were also rarely anthologized after Al-Ḥuṣrī’s Zahr al-ādāb, in clear contrast to Al-Ḥarīrī’s.

The debt of eighteenth-century maqāmas to Al-Ḥarīrī and others may be seen both by an analysis of the texts and the explicit comments on them in contemporary sources. Writers of biographical dictionaries often explicitly state that the authors vied with, or imitated, Al-Ḥarīrī in their production.

In the eighteenth century, the genre was varied, but very much bound to tradition. Its development was primarily an internal one. The majority of maqāmas written during the century follow earlier models rather closely and cannot be called innovative in theme, style or technique. Their variety arises from an intensive use of the whole width of the genre, not so much from inventing new forms or making new conquests. There were, however, changes in the statistical profile of the genre: some subgenres gained in favour, others lost, but no new subgenres were developed nor were important innovations made that would have gained access to the standard repertory of the genre. Compared with earlier centuries, we may see a slight preference for the panegyric maqāma and a continuation of the neglect of narrative in favour of rhetoric, which may be seen in the comparative lack of picaresque maqāmas. Picaresque maqāmas were occasionally written in the eighteenth century, but it has only been modern taste that has pointed them out as the most interesting pieces of the genre and this has caused a misguided evaluation of their importance in the development of the genre. The heavy rhetorization of the genre began with Al-Ḥarīrī and went further with each successive generation of maqāma authors, perhaps culminating in Ibn ʿaṣ-Sayqal ([82], d. 701/1301) whose maqāmas verge on the unreadable. Narrative gave place to linguistic finery.

The role of Al-Ḥarīrī in the following, nineteenth century deserves a short note. The often-repeated legend of Al-ʿāziṣī ([193] d. 1287/1871) “finding” Al-Ḥarīrī thanks to Western incentives should be erased from histories of modern Arabic literature. He did model himself on Al-Ḥarīrī and he did study Al-Ḥarīrī’s texts intensively while correcting the proofs of the second edition of Silvestre de Sacy’s edition of the maqāmas, but the idea that he, or for that matter, any Arab gentleman of the eighteenth or early nineteenth century could have been ignorant of Al-Ḥarīrī is preposterous. The numerous imitations of, and competitions with, Al-Ḥarīrī throughout these centuries show that there is no point in claiming that someone could have “discovered” Al-Ḥarīrī.7 Al-ʿāziṣī knew Al-Ḥarīrī perfectly well before coming across Silvestre de Sacy’s edition which is why he was given the task of correcting the edition in the first place. What may be counted as Western influence in the nineteenth-century maqāma is that his labour with the Western edition brought Al-ʿāziṣī into intimate contact with the maqāmas which he knew well, and this inspired him to write his Maṣma‘ al-bahrāyn which could well have remained unwritten had Al-Yāzīghī not worked with an edition of Al-Ḥarīrī.

---

One can hardly call the eighteenth-century maqāma an innovative genre. The genre was, though, not thoroughly imitative and adverse to new developments. There are individual pieces of interest which have remained little studied, mainly, I think, because they fall in between Classical and modern literature. For Classical scholars, they are, perhaps, too late to kindle interest, and modern scholars tend to be more interested in those works that can be perceived as predecessors of modernity, which in the case of maqāmas is rarely the case. The eighteenth-century maqāma, thus, falls in between two different interests, neither of which fully covers the eighteenth-century literature.

Of the more interesting maqāmas several were written either by members of the Baghdadian As-Suwaydī family or their dependents. A curiously constructed maqāma that deserves attention is Al-‘Umarī’s ([170] d. 1193/1779) Al-Maqāma ad-Duḵiliyya, which contains a long exposition of heresies inserted within a well-told maqāma frame, and ends with a panegyric reference to two of the As-Suwaydīs. The narrative parts show dramatic sensitivity and the author is in creative dialogue with tradition. This is at its clearest in the beginning, where we have the typical scene of a company of elegant youths in a garden being disturbed by an intruder. What is new is that here the intruder is the narrator and the hero is one of the elegant youths, which turns the usual setting upside down. The innovative feature is, however, in a sense also extremely conservative.
It inverts one of the basic topoi of the maqāma since Al-Hamaḍānī and, for its effect, depends on the familiarity of the topos. The innovation is based on internal development within the genre and it receives its piquancy from the fact that it stands in dialogue with the tradition.

The central part of Al-‘Umarī’s maqāma, the learned discussion of heresies, is basically an overly long showpiece of the hero’s eloquence and erudition. It differs from, e.g., Al-Ḥarīrī’s respective pieces only in two points, viz. its length and also perhaps its topic, which is less concerned with linguistic mastery than earlier maqāmas tended to be. When Al-Ḥarīrī gave his attention to the fatwāwā al-‘arab, it was not so much the religious content of the fatwās that was the point than the linguistic legerdemain involved in them.
It is no wonder that the technical part in Al-Ḥarīrī’s maqāma was quoted by As-Suyūṭī in his linguistic encyclopaedia, not in any of his religious works. Al-‘Umarī’s learned discussion is, moreover, written in a lively way which, rather surprisingly, is able to capture the attention of the reader through the lengthy exposition of heresies.

Another innovative maqāma written by the dependents of the As-Suwaydī family is Al-Maqāma az-zar‘iyya by Abū al-Fāth Naṣr Allāh al-Ḥusaynī ([162], presumably from the mid-eighteenth century), which, on first sight, might seem astonishingly modern in

---

9 In al-maqāma al-Ṭaybiyya (32). The technical part, for which see, e.g., Aš-Šarīfī: Ṣarḥ maqāmāt al-Ḥarīrī, ed. Muhammad ‘Abd al-Mun‘īm Ḥafāḡī, Bayrūt s.a., vol. III, pp. 140–149, forms the core of the maqāma.
10 As-Suyūṭī: Al-Muṣhir fī ‘ilm al-liqa‘ wa-anwā‘ihā, eds. Muhammad Ǧād al-Mawli Beg, Muhammad
In this maqāma, the narrator (who bears the same name as the author) listens to complaints by the neglected crop made against the new town-dwelling owner of the field. The maqāma sounds like a eulogy on agriculture and is most untypical of Classical literature, which always remained either urban or Bedouin in tone. It could be read as social criticism and, hence, taken as an indication of changing times and changing social conditions and attitudes. Yet I am doubtful about such a reading, however tempting it might be. The tone of the maqāma is far from serious and it difficult to discern any real social agenda behind the lamentations by the crop. It is not the aim of the author to draw attention to the neglected agricultural system in eighteenth-century Iraq, however much it would have deserved attention. Instead, the maqāma is a playful petition to a patron and the rural point of view is there, I believe, to make the listeners/readers laugh, not to awaken them to the social malaise in the countryside. In this, it is somewhat similar to Aš-Širbīnī’s ([144], d. after 1099/1687) Hazz al-quḥāf, which laughs at the villagers and their customs, but does this by presenting their life in a way which to a modern reader may bring social criticism to mind.12 Al-Maqaṣama az-zar‘īyya does, however, widen the scope of maqāmas by introducing a rural setting. It may also be that the gradual awakening of an interest in things outside contemporary cities and past fantasies of the imagined desert does foreshadow a change in social relations and attitudes and, hence, the maqāma, despite its basically conservative attitude may be taken as a sign of a changing world.

The As-Suwaydī family not only patronized maqāma authors. Some of them also tried their own hand at the genre. The most successful of the As-Suwaydīs was Šihāb ad-Dīn Āḥmad Ibn Ābī al-Barakāt ([176] d. 1210/1795), whose romantic maqāma successfully describes garden scenes and romantic involvements, skilfully avoiding muğūn, yet playing with erotic overtones.13 The end of the maqāma turns to panegyric aims: the Lady, in whom the narrator-cum-author has fallen in love, advises him to turn to ‘Uṯmān Efendi al-‘Umarī, a maqāma author himself (cf. above), who will certainly be attentive to the eulogies which close the maqāma. A homoerotic maqāma of the late eighteenth century by Āḥmad al-Rasmī ([171] d. 1197/1783), ultimately inspired by Al-Hamaḏānī’s Al-Maqaṣama al-Asadiyya and the tradition starting from there, is less successful, and descends at points into the obscene.14 In fact, it seems that homoerotic themes more often verge on the obscene than heteroerotic ones. This phenomenon is already to be seen in, e.g., the ghazals of Abū Nuwās, whose muḍakkarāt are often bolder than his mu’annaṭāt.15

Eighteenth-century maqāmas did, then, sometimes introduce minor innovations. But where does this innovativeness come from? Changes in the eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries are often attributed to European influence. In the case of maqāmas

---

it seems, though, that these changes are unlikely to be due to any European or outside influence. They grow from the tradition of the genre itself, crossbred mainly by the adjacent genre of munāẓara as well as romantic tales. Hasan al-‘Aṭṭār ([188] d. 1250/1834) did, to be sure, write a maqāma on the coming of the French and it certainly does take up an unprecedented theme, yet it hardly evidences European literary influence.

There was nothing new in making slight changes and introducing minor innovations in the genre. Most authors had always written strictly within the framework delineated by their predecessors, most notably by Al-Ḥarīrī, but there had always been exceptions, innovative authors searching for new ways of using the structure of the maqāma. Islamic Spain had been the hothouse of such innovations and some steps were taken there by authors such as Ibn aš-Šahīd ([12], late 5th/11th century) or even Ibn al-Aštarkūwī ([29] d. 538/1143) towards writing a kind of precursor to the modern novel, though the authors never took the final steps. After that, in late Medieval and Early Modern times, the maqāma made other innovative attempts. Limited innovativeness was part and parcel of the Classical tradition, and not every innovation needed to be backed up by foreign influence, literary or social. Classical Arabic literature in later centuries was conservative but not paralysed.

The eighteenth-century maqāma thrived within the Classical tradition, though this, perhaps, was its undoing. Al-Yāziği’s attempt to revive the genre was in a way fundamentalist. His maqāmas are strictly Ḥarīrīan and it is no surprise that they could not revive the genre in the changing literary environment despite their own success. When Classical Arabic culture dwindled, maqāmas more or less dwindled with them.

After the eighteenth century, the development of the maqāma was twofold. Classical maqāmas were, and still are, written but more as an antiquarian hobby than as modern literature. Some, like Al-Ǧabārī ([211] d. before 1331/1913), made slight innovations, but still remained strictly within the framework of the Classical tradition.16 Al-Ǧabārī’s use of substandard language in his otherwise rather Ḥarīrīan maqāmas might seem a European-inspired innovation, especially as the author worked as a civil servant for the French, yet this actually follows the tradition of the vulgar maqāma, which originated in the late twelfth century.

At the end of the 19th century and later, the Classical maqāma was crossbred with modern, Western-influenced literature by men such as Ahmad Fāris al-Ṣidyāq (d. 1305/1887), Muḥammad al-Muwayliḥ (d. 1349/1930), Ḥāfiẓ Ibrāhīm (d. 1351/1932) and Bayram at-Tūnusī (d. 1380/1961). Yet the maqāma is merely one constituent part in their respective works and not perhaps the most seminal one. In other words, these authors wrote within the tradition of modern, Western-inspired literature and merely borrowed the title and/or some technical features from the maqāmas. Their works do not grow out of the maqāma genre, but only borrow from it. One may borrow the use of complicated language, or even saqī, or a picaresque hero, but the result is only loosely connected with Classical maqāmas, even when the term maqāma is used in the title.

Maqāmas may perhaps exemplify the situation of early modern literature in general. The Classical literary tradition did live on, but it was not very vivid. In time, it gave way to new genres which were only marginally influenced by the older tradition. In modern literature, the maqāma perhaps fared less well than some other genres. What, then, were the causes of the demise of the maqāma? Such questions are never answerable and proposed answers must always remain speculative. But if I am allowed to speculate on this, I would like to point out the highly specialized style of the maqāmas, which are defined more by their technique than by their content. Once you take the linguistic legerdemain out of a maqāma the cornerstone of the genre is lost and what remains is a variety of prose texts that may make excellent reading, but hardly differ from anecdotes and other genres. Obviously, anecdotes were the origin of picaresque maqāmas, which one might call long anecdotes with certain stylistic additions. Once these stylistic features are taken away, we are back to the anecdotes and the genre of maqāma has vanished into thin air.

Finally, one should not forget that even if we may be more interested in texts that presage the nascent modern literature, the eighteenth-century was still predominantly Classical. There were few texts that were in any sense modern and the (largely un-interesting) bulk of literature, quantitatively speaking, remained Classical or post-Classical. And when it specifically comes to maqāmas, one is hard put to point to any significant departures towards modernity in this genre.